Once upon a time there was a day, and on that day, some things happened. Several of which involved specific things while others involved something else, common to all of them however, was a certain amount of activity, which was one of the main reasons the whole situation was able to exist, the amounts of activity so to say. And that was super amazing because some things happened at around the same time other things happened, while other things did not happen at all, but at most times of the day, it could be said that several things either had happened or were going to happen. The day could, under specific circumstances take the form of a situation, or another, understood here as unique combination of things and other things going on that in some way or another, had something to do with each other, at least to a degree of being associated. Which was completely fantastic because on this day, and in the case a situation was occurring, as it was occasionally the case, one could expect as number of different things happening either as a result of the circumstances or as a result of some other circumstances which happened to give shape to one thing or another. and once upon a moment there was a period of time, and during this period it was not uncommon for something to arise out of something else except when it didn't, and that was supper. To make things a bit more clear imagine the incidents in which more or less more-or-less-related things took place as experiences where everything that happened was in some way involved in and even definitive for the situation as a whole or the situation as a constitutive element of the day.

-Kofi Møller