Beyond the window is a shore. On the shore is a large rock where the sirens perch. For them, history and prophecy are equals. We walk down slowly and quietly to the rock, but our steps sound a fluttering of wings and much splashing. The smell of flesh is thoroughly washed out by the sea.

The rock lingers. It is dark gray with black and green stripes. Perfect to sit on. We study it every day. We touch and observe the sharp parts, the porous parts, and the soft parts covered with carpets of sea moss.

The waves carry the siren song and we put our ears to the rock to listen. The sun dries the rock to reveal a lighter register of color. The bottom of the rock is underwater. Patient things dwell there who take time with the rock and treat it with gentleness. Sea vegetables, urchins and grasses. Fishes pick at them. Crabs look out of the cracks where the water and air meet.

The sea brings things to the rock. The rock tests them; it is a critic. By now we know the rock's surface. Apart from song, there is no way to know what is inside the rock.

The rock cannot be shifted.
