Traumatized Lemon

ervaringen met masturbatie te delen. Door thema's aan te raken die vaak onaangeraakt blijven, pleit Győri voor het doorbreken van taboes en het opleveren van de onzichtbare grenzen tussen publiek en privé. Onderwerpen als welzijn, gezondheid, mentale en fysieke aandoeningen lopen als rode draad door haar kunstpraktijk. Fobieën voor virussen en kanker vormden het vertrekpunt voor een reeks werken in 2013: 'Boob Job Nike: A Monument to the Heroes of Warsaw' en 'Fear of the Breast 1-18 Analysis'. In het eerste werk gaf Győri het standbeeld van Nike in Warschau een borstvergroting, als symbool van succes, maar implementeerde eveneens een ziekte in de borsten – als signaal dat mensen in onze maatschappij aan beide lijden. Het tweede werk is een reeks tekeningen van borsten, besmet met gele en kleverige celkloneringen. Deze werken maakte zij reeds enkele jaren voordat bij haar borstkanker werd geconstateerd in 2017. Voor haar tentoonstelling in Vleeshal Markt heeft Győri een nieuwe reeks tekeningen, sculpturen en video's ontwikkeld, die een openhartige blik op haar omgang met kanker bieden. In een van de video's zien we hoe ze zichzelf op de avond voorafgaand aan de dubbele mastectomie voorbereidt op deze operatie. In een ritueel met haar moeder traint ze haar geest in een poging haar lichaam te accepteren en op een nieuwe toekomst voor te bereiden. Een toekomst waarin vrouwelijke borsten compleet nieuwe vormen kunnen aannemen en vrouwelijkheid zal bloeien.

[NL] De solotentoonstelling 'Traumatized Lemon' van Andrea Éva Győri (1985, Hongarije) is van 29 april tot en met 17 juni 2018 in Vleeshal Markt te zien. De oorspronkelijke opening is wegens ziekenhuisopname van de kunstenaar verschoven van 14 naar 28 april 2018. Het is de eerste institutionele solopresentatie van Győri's werk in Nederland.

Het werk van Andrea Éva Győri wordt gekenmerkt door een diepgaand onderzoek naar het menselijk lichaam en de geest. Wat weten we eigenlijk over ons lichaam? En wat delen we met elkaar? In 2012 startte de kunstenaar een 'douche tour', waarbij zij mensen vroeg of het mogelijk was in hun huis te douchen – aangezien zij op dat moment geen eigen douche had. Als beloning mocht de desbetreffende gastgever Győri's douchebeurt documenteren. Voor de Manifesta in 2016 werkte zij samen met een sekstherapeut met wie ze het vrouwelijk orgasme onderzocht. "Ik ben vooral geïnteresseerd in het vrouwelijk orgasme," schrijft de kunstenaar in haar recente publicatie 'Vibration Highway', "omdat ik denk dat dit een middel is om dieper in te gaan op de vraag hoe de geest het lichaam beïnvloedt en ons gedrag." In een intieme sfeer van eerlijkheid, vertrouwen en plezier maakte Andrea Éva Győri tekeningen van masturberende vrouwen, die haar studio bezochten om hun seksuele fantasieën en masturbating women, who came to her space to share their sexual fantasies and experiences with masturbation. Touching upon themes that are often left untouched, Győri pleads for a breaking down of taboos and a pushing of the invisible boundaries between public and private. Topics like well-being, health, mental and physical diseases run through her practice. Phobia of viruses and cancer formed the departing point for a series of works in 2013: 'Boob Job Nike: A Monument to the Heroes of Warsaw' and 'Fear of the Breast 1-18 Analysis'. In the first, Győri gave a statue of Nike in Warsaw a breast enlargement as a symbol of success and advantage, but also implanted a breast illness – implying that people in our societies suffer from both. The second is a series of drawings of breasts contaminated by yellowish and sticky body bulbs. These works were made long before she was diagnosed with breast cancer in 2017. For her exhibition at Vleeshal, Győri has developed a new series of drawings, sculptures and videos that offer an openhearted insight into how she handles cancer. In one of the new videos, we see how she prepares herself the night before the double mastectomy, training her mind in a ritual with her mother, to accept and direct the body to a new future. A future in which female chests can take on totally new forms and femininity can flourish.

Notes on Works

Gravity is not only a physical force, it is also an emotional state. Each is informed by the other. The weight of the bodies that we carry with us seems often dependent on how we feel. We seem lighter when inspired or experiencing pleasure. Heavier when sad or discouraged. The weight of each of our body's parts is conjoined in this, and each part separately holds its own emotional and physical force. All in a constant state of change. A woman's breasts carry a great weight. Heavier from being objectified. Heavier by the measure of femininity. The measure of maternity. Heavier from the threat of being invaded by a powerful force from within. When this invasion is infirm, this weight must be removed. What seems rigorous, becomes a beautiful new kind of body, with a new relationship to gravity. And the ability to soar again. Together with others, in order to collectively experience and learn to trust their new state of being. Without threat. With seemingly endless bounds. In the flames she learns to understand her new gravity. Her new balance. Her new body. The connection to a specific femininity – a natural maternal capacity – is transformed through the loss of her breasts. In turn, within a natural adjustment of balance, her genitals enhanced in strength and intensity. Those visible on the outside a bright marker of her burning renewal.

Those on the inside exhilarated with new found authority. She is standing in her fire. The omnipotent eye drives the hands, which have eyes as well on the fingers. The eyes are drifting everywhere. Like little radars, squeezing the lemon. The main eye steers the hands and the scanning eyes. The eyes are the connections between the mind and the body. They see and tell what happens in the body. Through the squeezing of the lemon, the eyes help to build an image about the body in the space of imagination. Help understand the relationship between active and passive, tension and release. The lemon has personality and feelings, emotions. The body wants to understand these, in order to better understand itself.

Shaking the apple, breaking the apple, hitting the apple, pushing into the apple, pushing the finger into the apple. The apple is passive. The apple is sweet and big. It has personality and emotions, yet it is not clever like the lemon. The eyes are still the connections between the mind and the body. Their connection to the hands is determinant. And the hands do not like the apple. The hands drive themselves and their fingers to shake the apple, break the apple, hit the apple, push into the apple. We see the whole act. All its active and passive parts. We see everyone participating.

A fold or a turn inside-out. The unknown body. The eyes are still the connection between body and mind. Now they are driven by the small figure. Together they cause this inversion. This cuffing. The small figure does not like the unknown body and wants to smash it. But the unknown body is without personality, without emotions. This violence brings the entire act closer to us. So close that we no longer see the whole act, or the whole forms of its participants. Biting and chewing awakens the face. Each muscle inherently joined to another to determine expression, affect, pleasure and pain. Our face is a constant emotional language. Exercises in biting and chewing could lead to a different language. The chewing gum the interlocutor. Understanding our face and its expressions is better understanding the relationship between passivity and activity, aggression and understanding. Better understanding our body's language and the capacity for that language to evolve. Sharing a piece of gum.

The closing of one's eyes can mean panic for some. The closing of one's eyes can feel like the loss of control because the imagination then seems endless. This omnious infinity becomes the starting point for a rush of fear. The body itself can reclaim control. The body is the balance between this fear and reclamation. And it marks its existence in this through little gestures. An itchy nose. An itchy nose will bring dizziness, will bring sweat, convulsions, legs and arms shaking. Collapse. An altered state of mind. The seeming end. Yet the end brings finiteness. The panic having reached its bounds. The body and mind refreshed. The participant goes on an imaginary expedition into their body, into their sex drive. They shrink and crawl inside where all small parts are discovered. They have to imagine what is inside, what would the eye on their finger see. Then they could put down on paper what they have seen. This task is to make contact with their body, and if they can do this in their imagination, it is much more important than to actually do it manually. After she has to draw a map about what she discovered. The picture becomes more and more complex and developed the more she discovers. The more she discovers the closer she gets to her body.

The brain learns and changes fastest if one incorporates the whole body: feeling one's hands, rocking one's pelvis. Letting our fingers discover ourselves. What we have. What we had. What we are now. What we imagine ourselves and our bodies to be.

There are active jaws which engage. They are tensed. There are passive jaws which are relaxed. They experience with their tongues the reaction of the unknown body. It is going to be bitten. The jaws are in communication with each other during the act. And their teeth have eyes. Always focussed on the most tense parts. They register this exchange. They send it on to their further bodies and brain. One body is unknown. It has no personality but it is able to react to what the jaws incite. It can creep away, sweat and flush.
