

EXHIBITION TEXT & IMAGE LIST

---

Artist: Shanta Rao
Title: This Many Coloured Sheen
Venue: Treignac Projet
Dates: 7 August - 3 October 2021

Curated by Eloise Sweetman

Venue adress:
2 Rue Ignace Dumergue
19260 Treignac
France
0783501549

IMAGE LIST:

---

- 1 Installation view
- 2 Untitled, 2020, polymer paint, 195 x 29 x 47cm
- 3 Installation view
- 4 Installation view
- 5 Installation view
- 6 Untitled, 2019/2021, polymer paint, 46 x 180 x 18 cm
- 7 Installation view
- 8 Installation view
- 9 Installation view
- 10 Installation view
- 11 Untitled, 2020, polymer paint, dimension and presentation variable
- 12 Installation view
- 13 Installation view
- 14 Detail: potato starch, pigments, corrugated plastic, plastic tarp
- 15 Untitled, 2018, polymer paint, 84 x 32 cm
- 16 Installation view
- 17 Detail: potato starch, pigments, corrugated fiberglass, plastic tarp
- 18 Untitled, 2021, potato starch, pigments, corrugated fiberglass, plastic tarp, metal grill, cinder block, 203 x 150 x 33 cm
- 19 Installation view
- 20 Untitled, 2021, polymer paint, metal handrail, dimensions and presentation variable
- 21 Detail: Untitled, 2021, polymer paint, metal handrail, dimensions and presentation variable
- 22 Installation view
- 23 Untitled, 2021, potato starch, pigments, corrugated fiberglass, plate, plastic tarp, cinder block. 201 x 100 x 30 cm
- 24 Untitled, 2021, potato starch, pigment, copper base, 180 x 90 x 10 cm
- 25 Detail: Untitled, 2021, potato starch, pigment, copper base, 180 x 90 x 10 cm

EXHIBITION TEXT

---

This Many-Coloured Sheen1

The presentation of soft artworks by Shanta Rao, bask in the late afternoon sun and float on the breeze. Celebrating an unfixed and always aesthetic becoming, the exhibition finds itself always in flux. Continuing their work together in group shows at Shimmer in Rotterdam and Salon de Normandie in Paris, This Many-Coloured Sheen is the first solo exhibition of Rao's curated by Eloise Sweetman.

Beginning with the jellyfish and its habitation in vehicles that have been dumped in the sea around Cassis, artist Shanta Rao has been developing a body of work that sits between scientific study, the deft gesture of drapery, and auto-body shop aesthetic. Rao thinly sprays multiple layers of elasticised marine paint mixed with iridescent<sup>2</sup> and interference<sup>3</sup> pigments onto car bumpers, bonnets, and doors. Eventually, with gentle and slow movements, Rao peels away the form of a car revealing multiple possibilities and chance encounters.

Taking a position temporally, geographically, politically, or aesthetically is a strong element in Rao's work. More importantly she allows for change, mistake, new information, or desire to enter into her creating and taking a new position. Learning from her material and the location where she is working, always informs new possibilities. Taking rest, giving pause, finding that position, gives Rao the time to contemplate, and us, the audience, time to take in what Rao has created.

The artistic approach of letting the artwork naturally take form is also an ecological approach, like the jellyfish that must adapt to its environment formed of marine life and human debris. As the artist will tell you, the jellyfish is also changing in the eyes of the scientists that classify them, from vegetal to animal, to something in between. They resist categorisation but at the same time do not need categorisation from science or art to survive. Rao's works are about a certain freedom, freedom from category and form. The form changes depending on the environment it is displayed in, the weather conditions and atmospheric reflections of the day, and those that attend to the form, be it the artist herself, the curator, or the owner who collects the piece.

In This Many-Coloured Sheen, Rao has been working with the found materials and references of Treignac project. The artist improvises and works with the site rather than imposing preconditioned ideas, hopes, or desires. In the main exhibition space of the old yarn factory are two yarn trolleys now repurposed as exhibition devices to drape Rao's artworks upon. The rust of the trolleys meets the rust of the car parts transferred onto the artworks. Here is a position found, a place to inhabit.

The brightly coloured reversible works are enjoyable to walk around. Taking different site lines, the work moves and morphs. Each piece is unique and forever changing. It requires careful attention from us as viewers, and is generous in return by always giving something new to see. The exhibition similarly meets the works, creating a journey to find the artworks, installed on pillars, on the floor or behind walls, becoming site co-dependent. The route between the two exhibition spaces is connected by an outside walkway, giving a moment to pause, reflect, take in the place that the exhibition inhabits.

An in-between moment of time, of movements, of connections.

For three weeks, as the summer flowers have blossomed and the river flows its ever-changing flow, Rao, with the assistance from Sam Holzberg, has been making new sculptural paintings on the top floor of the old yarn factory. Rao has moved towards the sunlight that pools into the room through skylights made of a see-through plastic cladding. The layering of space, colour, and materials is present in this room, framed by vines and accompanied by beetles, purple iridescent winged insects, and a now-empty bird's nest. Mixing pearlescent and chromatic pigments with glitter and potato paste, she and Holzberg spread the mixture onto sheets of skylight cladding. The pieces are turning from being wet pools of pigment, to drying and shrinking the plastic into root systems or waterways. Eventually— maybe it will be the day you visit the exhibition, perhaps it has already happened—the mixture will crack. These works will flake away on the breeze over the garden of Treignac projet.

The flakes might join the river path, covered with its own shiny iridescence of reflective mineral particles of Mica. A shimmering shaking colour, a many-coloured sheen where industry and the natural world coalesce.

*

This Many-Coloured Sheen is the second exhibition by Eloise Sweetman for Treignac Projet, it follows This Dusk Song, a solo show by Gwenneth Boelens (2020-2021). Sweetman's independent curatorial practice works with and is inspired by contemporary and historical female artists and their relationship with site, found or industrial material, and the breaking of hierarchies of form. Artists like Shanta Rao, Charlotte Posenenske, Katarzyna Kobro, Gwenneth Boelens, and Katie West, each with their own original and strong approach, give room for the material to tell them how the artwork will manifest, and also how the curator and audience can participate in the artworks' changing forms. Posenenske and Kobro made artworks that mimicked architectural forms that can be installed in many different positions, this too is seen in the work of Rao. Whereas Boelens and West, like Rao, work with experiences of non-linear time and a transformative space of flux and transition. All the artists step outside of category, which makes the exhibition an exciting place to inhabit as a curator and audience, as can be experienced in This Many-Coloured Sheen.

Written by Eloise Sweetman on the occasion of the solo exhibition by Shanta Rao.

Eloise Sweetman's (AU/NL) recent projects have been with Kröller-Müller Museum, Otterlo; PUBLICS, Helsinki; MADA Gallery, Melbourne; Van Eyck Academie, Maastricht; VER Gallery, Bangkok, De Appel, Amsterdam. She is also co-director of Shimmer in Rotterdam. More on her work visit: www.eloisesweetman.com

Shanta Rao (FR/IN) has exhibited at Galerie Edouard Manet, Gennevilliers; Shimmer, Rotterdam; FUTURA, Prague; Centre Pompidou, Paris; Nest, The Hague; Galerie Joseph Tang, Paris; National Institute of Design, Ahmedabad, India, among many others. More on her work visit: www.shantarao.net

This Many-Coloured Sheen is the second exhibition by Eloise Sweetman for Treignac Projet, it follows This Dusk Song, a solo show by Gwenneth Boelens (2020-2021). Sweetman's independent curatorial practice works with and is inspired by contemporary and historical female artists and their relationship with site, found or industrial material, and the breaking of hierarchies of form. Artists like Shanta Rao, Charlotte Posenenske, Katarzyna Kobro, Gwenneth Boelens, and Katie West each in their original and strong approach gives room for the material to tell them how the artwork will manifest, and also how the curator and audience can participate in the artworks changing forms. Posenenske and Kobro made artworks that mimicked architectural forms that can be installed in many different positions, this too is seen in the work of Rao. Whereas Boelens and West, like Rao, work with experiences of non-linear time and transformative space of flux and transition. All the artists step outside of category which makes the exhibition an exciting place to inhabit as a curator and audience, as it can be experienced in This Many-Coloured Sheen.