In her multimedia project Psalm's Trust, Klein explores popular culture, its iconography and its power as a means of mass communication. Psalm's Trust is a sitcom-in-progress within a soap opera that absorbs many different realities during its 55-minute length. The plot revolves around Blessing, the protagonist who, as the narrative unfolds, becomes a background character in her own story.

Psalm's Trust engages with such themes as depersonalization, religion within youth culture and free will against determinism. Through humour, choreographed movement and sitcom tropes, Klein tells a love story also exploring techniques from her past experience as a transcriber, researcher and logger in British children television programming.

For the set, Klein creates sculptural works which reimagine the space of the deconsecrated church. The artist positions the cast and audience into various fictional areas within her installation: living room, the road (outside), train station, church and bedroom.
