

"Part of the description of this product on Amazon was, "instead of standing for an 8 hour day, it will be like you stopped working at lunch and were relaxing pool side all afternoon." Um, no. it is not like this--so beware of marketing hype! But if you want a well-made slab of foam covered in durable rubber to stand on, this works just fine."

"I know the company bragged about waking up to new skin every day, but I truly believe that I have a new chance every morning of having a fresh soft look and that is very hard to get as a shift worker who is in their forties and who also smokes cigarettes."

"An adolescent walks down the street with a couple of friends eating an ice cream cone and suddenly smashes it into the coin return slot of a pay phone. It's a nihilistic, negative, gratuitous thing, not functional. It does not facilitate anything, yet it's a pleasure to make the thing function in this other way. I like using objects in the original sense, letting objects be what they are."

"Bought these for the bakery I own. The staff loves them. They work great. The cost is well worth reducing leg cramps and fatigue. I got it at first for a single employee who just had a knee surgery and ended up getting several more when the staff started fighting over them lol"

"It's pretty firm. Not as cushy or gel like, like Dr. Scholls or other competitors. Is it softer than standing on cement? Yes. But so would a pile of feces."
