An unoccupied stage set has often seemed to me to transmit a greater dramatic charge than the play that comes to pass upon it. Perhaps it is for similar reasons that some of the artworks I like best are still-lives from the renaissance period.
 – Claire-Louise Bennett

This new body of work by Michael Wilkinson develops the artist's concern with still life painting, both its poignant relationship to transience and its traditional engagement with trickery and humour through the use of trompe l'oeil. His approach can be understood as a kind of meta engagement with the genre. The paintings are elegantly 'self-conscious', pointing to the conditions of their making. To produce them, Wilkinson photographed a series of flowers (Dahlia, Lisianthus, Lily, Chrysanthemum) in vases set before blank linen framed in aluminium. These images provided the basis for the paintings, with the linen in the photographs coming to being 'represented' by areas of actual blank linen. The material functions both materially and figuratively; it is both the thing itself and its representation. The finished works are also framed in the same style of plain aluminium frame recorded in the paintings.

Wilkinson uses a technique he describes as fluorochiaroscuro<sup>TM</sup> in the paintings, embellishing a conventional representational style with fluorescent colours to emphasize the effect of light falling on his various subjects. This heightened effect produces a kind of 'psychedelic realism', corresponding to an altered perception of the ordinary. Wilkinson's interest in still life painting was triggered by the sense of suspended animation he experienced across 2020-2021. He found himself more attuned to domestic objects and had a heightened awareness of the passing of time. The photographs which formed the basis of these works were all taken across autumn and winter 2024, capturing the seasons' distinctive lighting conditions. The low afternoon sun casts dynamic shadows.

In 2014, Michael Ned Holte wrote that his understanding of Wilkinson's work was 'incremental and marked as much by misapprehension as by fixity'. This holds with the artist's shift to still life painting. He renders a conventional, even conservative, subject somewhat uncanny – the flowers oscillate between generic motifs and specific instances, and trompe l'oeil of the linen never allows the eye to settle. A punning conflation of the sculptural and pictorial was also explored by Wilkinson in his 'Mirrored Wall' series. In these Wilkinson created two distinct zones by removing silver from the back of mirrored glass, creating pictorial sections of reflective brick and transparent spaces which reveal gallery walls and wooden stretcher bars. As with his still lifes, these pieces drew the viewers' attention to the materiality of the artwork, playing with the expectation of or desire for illusion and representing a resistance to the art object's reification.
