Decoy

DECOY

"In dieser Ausstellung versuche ich absichtlich, den Betrachtungsprozess zu verlangsamen und meine Augen weiter zu öffnen, und ich ermutige den Betrachter, das Gleiche zu tun. Wenn wir in die Welt zurückkehren, werden wir vielleicht etwas genauer hinschauen, vielleicht werden wir mehr Schönheit und Unterschiede in der Wildnis entdecken."

Spencer Finch

In seiner sechsten Einzelausstellung in Berlin führt Spencer Finch seine Auseinandersetzung mit der Bedeutung von Farbe, Zeitlichkeit und dem Verhältnis von Wissenschaft und Poesie fort. Decoy vereint neue und zentrale, ältere Arbeiten, die durch radikale Reduzierung eine dynamische Bewegung zwischen Abstraktion und präziser Darstellung des Ephemeren schaffen. In den Arbeiten auf Papier, Malerei und einer großen Lichtinstallation für die Fenster der Galerie gelingt es ihm, das Flüchtige und Fließende greifbar zu machen und Perspektiven zu dokumentieren, die sich oftmals unserer Wahrnehmung entziehen.

Finchs Beschäftigung mit Licht und Farbe verweist dabei stets auf die Unmöglichkeit, zueinander einzigen Wahrheit zu gelangen. Die titelgebende Serie leuchtend monochromer Diptychen spielt mit der vieldeutigen Ambiguität von Dopplungen, Spiegelungen und Täuschung. Die beiden quadratischen Tafeln jedes Diptychons zeigen den gleichen Sekundärfarbton. In jeder Tafel der Arbeiten verwendet Finch vier verschiedene Farben, um einen nahezu gleichen Ton zu erzielen. Diese verschiedenen Farben sind sichtbar an den Seiten jeder Tafel und verraten so die Komposition der orangen, grünen oder violetten Flächen. Die marginalen Unterschiede verlangen eine verlangsamte Betrachtung und bestimmen die Rezeptionsgeschwindigkeit in der gesamten Ausstellung.

Seine Scent Zeichnungen erzeugen durch sinnlich verflochtene Darstellung eine synästhetische Erfahrung. Auch hier ist ein verlangsamtes Sehen entscheidend, um die Zeichnungen zu erkennen, in denen Finch auf Bilder von Manet, Matisse und Hasegawa Bezug nimmt.

'In this exhibition I am intentionally trying to slow down the viewing process and open my eyes wider, and I am asking the viewer to do the same. When we return to the world, maybe we will look a bit more carefully, maybe we will find more beauty and difference out there in the wild.'

Spencer Finch

In his sixth solo show in Berlin, Spencer Finch continues to explore the meaning of color, the passing of time, and the relationship between science and poetry. The exhibition entitled Decoy includes new and important older works that in their radical reduction create a dynamic movement between abstraction and a precise rendering of the ephemeral. In the works on paper, paintings, and a large light installation for the gallery's windows, he succeeds in making the fleeting and evanescent palpable and in documenting perspectives that often escape our notice.

Finch's engagement with light and color always refers to the impossibility of reaching a singular truth. The series of bright monochromatic diptychs that give the exhibition its title plays with the telling ambiguity of doublings, reflections, and deception. The two square panels in each diptych show the same secondary color. Each panel of each diptych used a different four pigments to arrive at almost the same final color. These different pigments can be seen on the outer edges of each square and thus reveal the composition of the final color; orange, green or violet. The marginal differences require a slowed perception and determine the speed of reception for the exhibition as a whole.

His Scent drawings generate a synesthetic experience with their sensually interlaced representation. Slowed vision is also necessary to recognize these drawings, in which Finch refers to paintings by Manet, Matisse, and Hasegawa. What initially appears as blank sheets slowly reveal an image, that fades in and out as the viewer's attention shifts.

Was zunächst wie leere Blätter erscheint, offenbart allmählich ein Bild, das mit wechselnder Aufmerksamkeit der Betrachtenden erscheint und wieder verschwindet. Sie erzeugen die Ahnung eines dezenten Dufts und wirken wie Fragmente eines Sinneseindrucks, der kaum noch zu benennen ist. Finch unterstreicht die komplexe Vielschichtigkeit eines wahrgenommenen Moments, um gleichermaßen die Dominanz des Visuellen bei der Entstehung unserer Erinnerungen infrage zu stellen. Er hält in seinen Arbeiten fest, was sich unserer automatisierten Wahrnehmung entzieht. Flüchtige Phänomene – wie die Brechung von Emily Dickinsons Garten in einem einzigen Regentropfen auf dem Fensterglas – werden zu poetischen Annäherungen an etwas, zu dem wir nicht mehr zurückkehren können. Er schafft so sinnliche Verbindungen zwischen Vergangenem und dem Jetzt. Einen vergleichbaren Ansatz verfolgt er mit seiner Arbeit am Fenster der Galerie. Mithilfe von Farbfiltern rekonstruiert er genau das Licht und die Farbe des Sonnenuntergangs, den er aus seinem Atelier in Brooklyn beobachten konnte. Wie dort, richtet sich der Blick auch hier nach Westen. Doch statt eines klaren Ausblicks wird die Sicht versperrt. Es kommt zu einer überlagernden Gleichzeitigkeit von Erinnerung und Gegenwart. Finch gelingt es, diesen Moment auf eine Weise festzuhalten, die über die brüchige Indexikalität einer Fotografie hinausgeht.

Das Interesse an der Sichtbarmachung visuell flüchtiger Phänomene findet besonderen Ausdruck in den Fog Studies. Darin widmet sich der Darstellung von Nebel, um das Naturphänomen festzuhalten und die Beschränkung unseres Sehens greifbar zu machen. Ein Paradox, das es ermöglicht, die daraus resultierende Eröffnung neuer Wahrnehmungsebenen zu reflektieren.

Die Arbeiten der Ausstellung fangen unseren Blick ein, um ihn, ganz wie ein Decoy (dt. Köder, Lockvogel), auf etwas zu lenken, das sich als etwas anderes ausgibt. Ein spielerischer Trick, der unsere Sinne verführt. Finch führt uns vor Augen, dass wissenschaftliche Annäherungen an Phänomene wie Licht, Farbe und Erinnerung unzulänglich sind. Seine ruhige poetische Auseinandersetzung mit diesen schafft eine Form der Erkenntnis, die jenseits des Messbaren liegt. Sie verlangsamt unsere Wahrnehmung, um diese für die Schönheit unserer Umgebung zu schärfen, die sonst unbemerkt an uns vorüberzieht.

They generate the sensation of a discreet scent and seem like fragments of a sensory impression that is scarcely nameable. Finch underscores the complexity of a perceived moment, questioning at the same time the dominance of the visual in the emergence of our memories. In his works, he captures what escapes our automatic perception. Fleeting phenomena, like the refraction of Emily Dickinson's garden in a single raindrop on a window pane, become poetic approaches to something that is impossible to return to. He thus creates sensual links between past and present. Finch takes a comparable approach in his new work on the gallery window. Using color filters, he reconstructs the light and the color of the sunset that he observed from his studio in Brooklyn. The gaze here is toward the west, just like the window in his studio. But instead of a clear view, our vision here is blocked. This results in a superimposed simultaneity of memory and the present. Finch succeeds in reproducing this moment in a way that goes beyond the fragile indexicality of a photograph. His interest in making fleeting visual phenomena palpable is expressed in a special way in his Fog Studies. He turns to the depiction of fog to capture the natural phenomenon and at the same time points to the limitation of our vision, a paradox that enables us to reflect upon the opening of new layers of perception that this allows.

Just like a decoy, the works in this exhibition capture our gaze to direct it to something that pretends to be something else, a playful game that tricks our senses. Finch demonstrates how scientific approaches to phenomena such as light, color, and memory are inadequate. His restful, poetic engagement creates a form of recognition that lies beyond the measurable. It slows our perception to focus on the beauty of our surroundings that otherwise passes by unnoticed.
