Tonight, hold a tall beer.

The silver can, black and red, should feel cold in your hand - like a fish, a fresh sardine.

A kilo of salt eats away at the dock and the moss eats away at the salt.

Little births everywhere and the rust, leaving metal for water at every lapping edge, colors and shimmers when the citrus sunsets start their show and fins cut the bay like mirrored teeth.

You look out into the harbor, there's the passage way, there's the green statue.

Steam, dripping from the bridge soaring over women carrying children, guys taking down buildings with their bare hands and the ruins, shining through dust clouds swirling ever skyward.

The best policy melts across the asphalt, down amidst the sewer grates, the fog, the smoke, the glowing lights in wet windows, the coins glinting in the road works at the busy courthouse.

If you told me you knew and I said I didn't believe you, how would you prove it to me!
