

Mark Hilton's Collective Autonomy was a breathtaking sequence of exquisitely detailed light boxes, whose confronting subject matter challenged us to rethink our notions of contemporary Australian culture. Each light box was executed in a traditional cultural style – Medieval fresco, ancient Persian court painting and Chinese coffin-lid carving. Despite these diverse and historical aesthetic approaches, the works allegorically grapple with unsettling socio-political events in present-day Australia. These include the notorious stabbing deaths at Melbourne's Salt Nightclub in 2003, and the alleged culture of sexual abuse in Australia's elite football teams. Considered together, the works in Collective Autonomy serve as a reflection, memorial, and unflinching critical investigation into some of the darker aspects of Australian culture.
