—Who is your neighbour?

Peering across the street, you watch your neighbour take out the trash. The ceiling light stays on as they disappear from the window and emerge below on the street. They pause, speak to someone, return inside, climb the stairs and disappear back into their flat — back to the same window where you first noticed them. They start washing their dishes while you are finishing yours. And all the while, another neighbour watches you out of sight: your chores, your pauses, your rhythms. Each of you bounce between observer and subject, framed by proximity, separated by the structures of ordinary life: rooms, doors, window panes.

In Alexander Lee Page's paintings, grids are incised into dark surfaces to reveal buried colour; through sgraffito, layers of paint open onto multiple planes of existence — from distant landscapes to the city's horizon, to levels and rooms, mostly vacant, to the organic forms that drift in and out of them, altogether tracing a psychological architecture of ordinary life. This extends beyond the paintings into the space itself: black steel frames the works and shapes the floor with an unexpected softness. A chair faces the window. What the domestic intimacy was meant to shelter is inevitably exposed through proximity. In the act of withholding, something always escapes — gestures, hesitations, traces of an interiority that cannot be fully concealed.
