

AN ERRATIC STORM: REACHING OUT TO THE INFINITE

An Erratic Storm: Reaching Out to the Infinite is concerned with the shudder and veneration produced by an encounter with what exceeds human scale. The experience overwhelms the ego and confronts the individual with their own physical powerlessness.

The title borrows from meteorology but resists its logic. A storm is measurable, trackable, its violence mappable onto data. What the works in this exhibition produce is something closer to the opposite: a condition of exposure without coordinates, where the body registers something it cannot yet name.

Across the exhibition, works are positioned to produce moments of pause and confrontation. Paired forms establish visual correspondences that verge on figuration, while sound and moving image punctuate the space intermittently, introducing rhythm and interruption rather than narrative continuity. Large-scale painted surfaces occupy the space with dense textures and shifting tonal fields.

The placement of other works plays with weight, balance and proximity. Sculptural elements span hollowed forms, metallic structures, and suspended or freestanding objects, some wall-mounted and others floor-bound. These works mimic industrial components yet remain unstable in both scale and function. Similarly, same-sized photographic prints are installed at different heights, disrupting familiar hierarchies of display. Elevated fabric surfaces appear displaced or withheld from direct use, registering as skins or imprints of the architecture itself rather than static images, absorbing light and distance.

The exhibition holds multiple centres simultaneously, each work generating its own field of attention. These encounters return the viewer to the threshold of what cannot be named or commanded, left without resolution.
