I'm supposed to look away from flashes of Your wristwatch. Looking away does not go far enough. It's not a bend of the back, a strange bow.

If mirrored bowing prolongs our meeting each other, then it forms an absence, a space. This space stretches and has tendrils - trailing without direction.

The strive for that intangible something we reach for when being creative, kind of like imagined euphoria. Think-typing a joke and hitting backspace. It's the pain of being self aware and the subsequent empathy that makes life feel alive.

In times of deep unease, banality rears its flattened face to you and you wonder what changes there are you can make to forget it.
